The intent is that you can add/edit text content in the browser, without other document content (headers/footers, text boxes etc) getting lost. So I thought I'd link to a proof of concept we did a year or so ago. The idea is: use docx4j to convert the docx to XHTML use CKEditor to edit that XHTML in the web browser on client, convert the XHTML back to docx content The general problem with converting to/from XHTML is the "impedance mismatch", what kind of editing? is it proof reading, customising particular sections, a step in a workflow.? And if so, is a dedicated app on your roadmap? do you need to cater for iPads or Android tablets? The docx will be streamed back to your computer as a download in your browser, any additional requirements you might have!
